

FX – What clients think: Informal survey responses

- More than 50% of clients think that a narrow US-China pact is more than 75% priced in
- More than 60% see less than a 15% chance of a hard Brexit; 34% see GBP north of 1.35 on a deal
- Almost 33% see a hawkish Fed on 30 October versus 5% dovish
- More than 55% see President Trump's re-election probability above 53%
- Almost 90% see the DXY weaker if a Democrat wins the presidential election

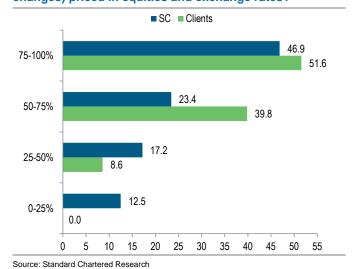

What clients expect

We sent out a survey to clients and colleagues on 28 October to gauge what they think about key asset market and macroeconomic themes. We also queried SC colleagues. Below is a quick summary of responses so far (65 external, 34 internal). Taking the questions together, good news on a limited trade deal and Brexit is viewed as largely, but not fully priced in. However, clients worry that the FOMC will send a hawkish signal at its 30 October meeting, possibly by changing the Statement text to remove the "act as appropriate" phrasing. There is weak conviction that the EUR may have turned the corner, and considerable conviction that a Democratic presidential election win could bring a much weaker USD.

1. How much is a narrow trade deal (limited to agriculture, limited tariff rollback and other modest changes) priced into equities and exchange rates?

Half of our client respondents see a narrow US China trade deal as more than 75% priced in; only 10% consider it less than 50% priced in (Figure 1). By contrast, about 30% of SC colleagues see the trade deal as less than 50% priced in. The S&P is up about 5% from early October lows and UST 10Y yields are up 30bps. Using 75% as an estimate of how much is priced in suggests 1-2% more on equities and maybe 10bps higher on USTs, assuming the moves are wholly driven by the likelihood of a small deal.

2. If the narrow deal is formalised, what is the best position to own? (Choose up to two positions)

On a deal, a wide variety of assets will likely appreciate (Figure 2). Among clients and SC colleagues, the assets thought most likely to appreciate are US equities, EM high yielders, and China's equities. USTs are expected to sell off. About 16% of SC colleagues saw the AUD, CNY and CNH as most attractive, about double the client share. Both among clients and SC colleagues, somewhat over 10% thought the deal was fully priced in or had overshot.

3. What is the risk of a hard Brexit over the next year?

4. Where will GBP trade in six months if there is some negotiated Brexit deal?

More than 60% of clients saw a hard Brexit risk as less than 15% (SC 47%), with a further 25-30% seeing hard Brexit as a 15-30% risk. Almost 35% of clients saw the GBP above 1.35 on a deal and 48% trading in a 1.30-1.35 range (Figure 3). Both clients and SC colleagues see near 85% probability that the GBP trades above 1.30 on a negotiated deal. On 29 October, we recommended a long GBP position on the view that a hard Brexit has become extremely unlikely (ACT: Buy GBP-USD).

About 25% of SC colleagues see more than a 30% chance of a hard Brexit vs, 12% of clients. For those who see significant risk of a hard Brexit, there are some attractive downside GBP opportunities.

5. Markets now price in about a 30-35% probability of a December FOMC cut, and close to 100% for a cut in October. On 30 October, do you think the Fed will be neutral, hawkish or dovish relative to this market pricing?

6. Do you expect the FOMC to modify the phrase "will act as appropriate to sustain the expansion"? Will a change be viewed as hawkish relative to current pricing?

About 60% of clients and SC colleagues expect the Fed to be neutral relative to market pricing (which is unsurprising). However, the split between hawkish and dovish skews among clients was 33% hawkish, 5% dovish (Figure 5). This matches our anecdotal perception that clients are going into the FOMC meeting with a hawkish skew. For SC colleagues the risk distribution was more symmetrical: 19% expected a hawkish surprise, 22% a dovish surprise.

The key Statement decision is whether the FOMC keeps "will act as appropriate" and how markets will react if this phrase is weakened. More than 75% of clients expected the recent phrasing to stay and 64% saw a change in phrasing as hawkish (Figure 6). Less than 15% of clients thought the FOMC could change the phrasing without it being viewed as hawkish.

- 7. Online political trading markets give President Trump a 42% chance of reelection? What is Your subjective probability of re-election?
- 8. How will the DXY (the USD index) trade if the most likely Democrat (your subjective view) wins?

More than 55% of clients see the probability of President Trump being re-elected as above 53%, of which 25% saw a more than 60% chance of re-election. 21% of clients were in our toss-up range (48-52% re-election probability). SC colleagues saw slightly higher probability than clients that President Trump would be re-elected (Figure 7).

There was a strong client consensus that the DXY would weaken if a Democrat won (we did not distinguish among Democrats). Almost 40% of clients thought the USD would drop 5% or more and 34% 2-5% (Figure 8). Notwithstanding the higher probability that SC colleagues assigned to Trump's re-election, they were slightly less pessimistic on the USD if he lost. Among SC colleagues, 50% thought the DXY would fall by 2% or more versus 74% of clients.

9. Do you think the EUR has seen its cyclical low?

Over 60% of clients and SC colleagues thought we have passed the EUR cyclical low (Figure 9). Treating the September low of 1.0899 as the bottom, options markets price in a c.44% risk that the EUR will not trade below this level over the next year and a 35% chance that it will not trade below the level over the next two years, so there is some correspondence between the survey and market pricing. This also matches anecdotal client discussions – there is a perception that some EUR negatives are being removed, but not much conviction that the EUR is on a definitive upward trend.
